A study was performed in 20 women to determine the discriminatory power of two quantitative and discriminative skin-directed tests for alopecia areata. The occurrence of scalp hairs was examined by counting and measuring the number and area of alopecic patches, and by measuring the number and area of red scalp hairs using a computerized video image analysis system. Total scalp hair counts and measurements showed no significant differences between both scalp areas and between either scalp area and the control area. The occurrence of red scalp hairs showed significant differences in both area and number between both scalp areas and the control area and between the 2 scalp areas. Also, the area of red scalp hairs differed significantly between the two scalp areas. The discriminatory power of these tests was limited.The IT architect's passion to learn is a strong motivational factor that drives companies to strive for high performance. The expert review “The best part was that the online testing helped to assess the quality of the learning. I could then compare the different courses on my device and choose the one that better fits my study habits and schedule.” “It's the most hands-on course I have ever seen on a läuflein online video course. You can see it's aimed for beginners and if you compare it to the other courses, it's much more hands-on. The support “I had a question on a review and in a couple of minutes, I had a positive feedback from the support. It seems that they love the challenge of training other IT-enthusiasts. It’s a refreshing change when you can get an answer to your
